Egyptians Visit College To Study U.S. Methods

By Phyllis Zlotogura

A delegation of Egyptian educators will visit the Baruch School this week as part of their six-month stay in the United States. The group is sponsored by A. Khaki, Director of the Egyptian Education Bureau.

The educational program will include a series of talks by professors and officers of the School. In addition, the delegation will attend discussions and field trips describing the School's educational methods and how government and business can operate independently of one another.

Among the seminars will cover such topics as problems in public administration and administration of public agencies; marketing research; and industrial management.

The field trips will include visits to the Port of New York Authority, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, and a concluding trip to the Police Academy.

The highlight of their tour will be a tomorrow evening's reception at the American Club, where among the dignitaries present will be an Egyptian delegation from the United Nations, prominent men in the field of business and a select group from the College.

The Egyptians are following previous European delegations from France and Austria, who came to the School to gain information aimed at benefiting their respective nations.

Lewis Out

It has happened again. Another promising City College basketball player has been ruled ineligible.

This time it was Hector Lewis, the talented 6-6 British Guianan. The Registrar's Office announced that Lewis dropped a 1:40 credit course, leaving him with only 11 1/2 credits this term. An athlete needs a minimum of 12 points to compete. Lewis, a sophomore, follows six other members of last year's freshman five into the scholastic penalty box. However, he will be eligible next term.
